

Part III: The Roots of English and the Cradle of Civilization. Although many books have been written about the roots of languages and the cradle of our present civilization, none of these books derive the roots of the languages properly and much less is known about the cradle of the present civilization. This author has therefore endeavored to cover the History of Mankind and the roots of the languages based on his expertise on this subject. According to this author, language is the key to the history of mankind. He has shown that the roots, in particular of English, lie in Telugu, the earlier form of Latin. Sanskrit was born from Telugu. English has been derived from both Telugu and Sanskrit. This also applies to all other Indo-European Languages. According to this author, this civilization is about 52,000 years old. The first 26,000 years constitute the day and the next 26,000 years the night. Not much is known about the dawning of this civilization. At that time, countries such as India were filled with wild animals and monkeys. From Brahmaa are born Ten Prajapatis. These Prajapatis proceeded to create all the twelve tribes of the mankind. During the night, this civilization began to grow and it has come to its very tail end. The thesis presented in this article may be further augmented and many more details may be worked out. The author leaves this research to others. Just as Sanskrit is the mother of all languages, so also is Hinduism the mother of all religions. On the surface, religions may appear to be quite different, but at the core all religions embrace the same ideas present in Hinduism. Thus Judaism and Christianity spring from Hinduism alone and are considered as the extension of Hinduism by this author. According to this author, Vishnu has only eight Incarnations. India is the cradle of the present civilization. Hinduism is the mother of all other religions.
